DRC-NH Staff: Hi, good afternoon. With one in five Americans experiencing a disability, including 19 percent of likely voters, I'm just curious as to what your campaign is doing to either employ people with disabilities or if you're elected president what your administration would do to hire people with disabilities and finally, is your campaign doing anything to make sure that events such as this are accessible to people with disabilities?

Marianne Williamson: So, I recognize the importance of the American with Disabilities Act. I understand the importance of taking any group that might otherwise feel marginalized and making sure that they are part of a vital every every vital aspect of American society and that there is nothing in a in a way that could be addressed legally that thwarts that ability.

In terms of my campaign? No, I think [laughing] I think there are certain times at the end of a day when I'm so tired I have some emotional disability but I believe in terms of when I think in terms of the staff, and it is a small staff, I do not have the kind of money that other campaigns have. So no there is no one that is that is part of a disabled community working on my staff. Although I thank you for bringing it up because while I do certainly think in terms of diversity on the campaign that until you just said that I had not included that in my thinking and as the campaign grows I promise you I will not forget what you just said and as the campaign grows and I have more money and I can build more infrastructure that will definitely be part of of my thinking and our operation.

In addition to that because you brought it up, I promise you if I'm president of the United States, you will see that I didn't forget that you said that to me today.
